What is a Mexican courtyard house?

The magic mix of tradition and tranquility hidden within the inviting nooks of Mexican courtyard houses. Imagine you've just stepped into a sun-drenched courtyard, where the scent of blooming bougainvillea is so delightful, even the cacti have started cracking smiles.

Is this Mexican courtyard really sunbathing?

This place is practically sunbathing in its own brilliance. This Mexican courtyard beckons with its inviting blend of elegance and warmth. Archways parade like synchronized swimmers in a tidy formation, while wooden beams above wink mischievously at anyone daring enough to relax below.

What does a Mexican courtyard look like?

This charming Mexican courtyard showcases a vibrant orange facade with gracefully arched doorways. The rustic stone columns and elegant hanging lanterns give it a touch of Mediterranean flair. A serene water feature reflects the warm colors of the building, while vibrant green plants abound, making it a lush oasis.

Does a squared plan courtyard receive more solar radiation than a rectangular one?

As the traditional courtyard houses in Colima have only one storey, the current study mainly considered the effect of L/W proportion. In the same way as previous studies [13, 28], it was observed that squared plan courtyards received less solar radiation in comparison with rectangular ones.
